On a blustery afternoon along Whitchurch Road, you'll often spot a ridge tile sitting slightly out of line, or a dark streak running down a gable where water has found a way in. Heath and Birchgrove are full of solid semis and neat terraces, most of them topped with concrete tiles that have been up there for decades. Redland Roofing Cardiff looks after these roofs every week, and as a family-owned business led by John Owen, with over 30 years in the trade, the team knows exactly how these tiled roofs tend to age. Concrete interlocking tiles are tough, but they aren't everlasting. The surface wears, moss takes hold and holds moisture against the tile, and eventually corners crack or whole tiles slip out of their course. The mortar under ridge tiles dries out and crumbles, which is why a strong gust can leave a ridge rocking. Gable ends are another weak spot, especially where the old mortar verge has cracked. In many cases fitting dry verge caps solves the problem for good, and replacing broken vent covers stops birds and rain getting into the loft. Most of these jobs are straightforward tile repairs rather than anything major. Heath has a character of its own. The streets around the University Hospital of Wales are lined with interwar and post-war semis, while Birchgrove mixes semis with terraces around the shops on Caerphilly Road. Life near a busy hospital doesn't keep office hours, and neither do roof leaks, so it helps that Redland Roofing Cardiff is open 24 hours, 7 days a week. The Rumney base is a short drive across along Eastern Avenue, which means a visit to Heath, Birchgrove or neighbouring Llanishen and Gabalfa rarely takes long to arrange.
