Identify the O'Hare flight leg and distinguish it from the ground-transfer schedule. You are arranging transportation for someone else. Contact Limo LLC provides airport transportation between Kenosha and O'Hare. Use these details to discuss the actual journey and keep any point still needing confirmation visible.

Give the traveler a usable handoff

Give the passenger the current transportation information as well as keeping your own organizer copy. Identify who will answer a question about the flight, who knows the Kenosha address and who will be available during travel. A traveler should not have to reconstruct the plan from an invitation that contains only the organizer's details. When the arrangements change, send the agreed update to the passenger directly. Keep questions that still need confirmation visible so the handoff does not make a tentative detail look settled.

Separate the outbound and return legs

Create an outbound line and a return line when requesting both directions. For each one, record the airline, flight number, date and scheduled time. Label whether the time refers to departure from O'Hare or arrival at O'Hare. The same list of numbers becomes much easier to use once direction is explicit.

For a departure from Kenosha, identify the flight leaving O'Hare. For a return to Kenosha, identify the flight landing there. Keep connecting flights available for context, but do not let them replace the relevant airport leg. If two passengers have different itineraries, describe each itinerary rather than assuming the group shares the same final flight.

Read itinerary changes in full

When an airline sends a revision, compare the date, flight number and airport as well as the time. A message described as a schedule change may alter more than a calendar entry. Send the relevant new information to the transportation provider and identify which direction of travel it affects.

A useful update names the old arrangement and the revised flight details in plain language. Avoid forwarding a long thread without explaining what changed. Keep the current version easy to find so an earlier confirmation does not remain the most visible document for someone arranging the ride from an office or home.

Keep terminal information in context

Share the terminal information shown on your current airline itinerary, and check it again as travel approaches. Treat the airline information as part of the flight record rather than a permanent instruction. Ask about the passenger meeting arrangement for your specific reservation instead of deriving it from a terminal name alone.

For an arrival, explain whether the group is traveling with checked bags and whether everyone lands together. For a departure, give the complete Kenosha pickup address and the airport arrival goal you want to discuss. These details connect the flight record to the actual passenger movement on the ground.

Send only what the ride discussion needs

A transportation request can be clear without sharing an entire personal travel folder. A short summary of the relevant flight, address, passengers, luggage and lead contact is easier to review. Keep sensitive travel documents and unrelated reservation information out of a message unless there is a specific Contact Limo LLC reason they are needed.

If you are uncertain which flight detail matters, describe the complete sequence in words and ask the team to confirm the relevant leg. When a flight is delayed, let the team know so pickup arrangements can be discussed. Keep the latest agreed transportation details alongside the current itinerary, and make sure the traveler has access to both before leaving Kenosha or beginning the return journey.
