

Moving often generates a significant amount of waste, from cardboard boxes to plastic wrap and packing peanuts. With a bit of planning, households can reduce this environmental impact while still working with experienced DMV movers for a smooth relocation.

Using Reusable Containers Instead of Cardboard

Plastic storage bins can replace cardboard boxes for many items and offer the added benefit of reuse after the move for home organization. While these bins cost more upfront than cardboard, they eliminate the need to purchase and dispose of boxes for future moves.

Sourcing Used Boxes Before Buying New

Local grocery stores, liquor stores, and community groups often give away sturdy used boxes for free. Checking neighborhood online marketplaces or community boards for recently moved households looking to pass along their moving boxes is another way to reduce demand for new cardboard.

Choosing Sustainable Packing Materials

Towels, blankets, and clothing already in your home can double as padding for fragile items, reducing the need for bubble wrap or packing peanuts. Biodegradable packing peanuts, made from cornstarch, offer an eco-friendly alternative when extra cushioning is needed.

Recycling Cardboard After the Move

Break down cardboard boxes after unpacking and recycle them through local curbside programs or drop-off recycling centers. Many communities across the DMV region also have box recycling events or programs specifically for large volumes of moving boxes.

Donating Rather Than Discarding Unwanted Items

Items no longer needed after downsizing can often be donated rather than thrown away, reducing landfill waste while benefiting local charities and community members in need.

Passing Along Moving Supplies to Others

Once your move is complete, consider offering leftover boxes and packing materials to friends, neighbors, or local community groups planning their own upcoming moves, extending the life of these materials rather than sending them straight to the trash.
