They're connected via a stem or stalk and are commonly the same color as your skin. In contrast, moles are raised spots that have a different coloring than your skin.

- Moles occur when cells in the skin expand in a cluster as opposed to being spread out throughout the skin.
- Reducing or melting any type of component of your skin purposefully can cause infection and permanent scarring.
- Because of their pigment, they have the rare possibility to change from a routine mole into skin cancer cells.

At Wendell Household Medicine, our companies commonly see a rise in skin tags amongst older adults, and there are numerous factors for this pattern. As individuals age, the skin normally undertakes structural changes--consisting of a steady loss of collagen and elastin, which are healthy proteins that keep skin firm and resistant. In time, areas of skin that regularly massage versus clothing, skin folds up, or other surface areas come to be more vulnerable to little flaps of skin forming. These little growths, known as skin tags, are benign collections of added tissue that tend to show up more often with age. In addition, as the body ages, the skin's regenerative processes reduce, making it simpler for tiny locations of excess cells to continue rather than resolve by themselves.
