

How to Choose a Law Firm in Omaha What to Ask Before You Hire Start with fit, not with the biggest billboard on West Dodge Road. The right choice is a firm whose attorneys regularly handle your personal injury law firm type of problem and who will tell you plainly who does the work, how they will communicate, and how fees are structured, all before you sign an engagement letter. Those answers come from asking direct questions in the first meeting, and a good firm expects them. The first thing to ask is how often the attorneys handle matters like yours. A dispute over a construction contract in Elkhorn calls for different experience than a trust for a family in Rockbrook or an employee handbook for a manufacturer along the 108th Street corridor. Erickson | Sederstrom P.C., L.L.O. Law Firm lists ten practice areas, covering corporate, employment, estate planning, litigation, real estate, tax, insurance, construction, aviation, and intellectual property, and it is fair to ask any firm which of its lawyers focus on the area you need and for how long. Ask, too, whether colleagues can be brought in if your matter touches more than one field, because a business sale often raises tax and employment questions at the same time. Next, ask who will actually work on your file. Some clients meet a senior attorney once and then hear only from someone else. Find out who your day-to-day contact will be, how quickly calls and emails are returned, and how you will be updated as things move. Charles V. Sederstrom, who joined founder Don Erickson as a partner shortly after the firm opened in 1967, put the standard this way: "A client's needs come first. You always have to be responsive to what their needs are. If you say you're going to call them, you have to follow up on your word." That is a useful yardstick for any Omaha law firm you interview.

The attorneys at this firm are licensed across Nebraska, Iowa, South Dakota, Colorado and Kansas, which matters for a company with a warehouse in Council Bluffs or customers in Kansas.
