

Prepare a yard brief by describing how you want to use the space before choosing individual features. List the routes you need to keep open, the areas you want to enjoy and the existing planting or structures you want considered. Keep the brief short enough to use during a conversation.

Describe the everyday use

Explain who uses the yard and what you would like to do there. Mark the entrance, a seating area you are considering and the places where you want to retain open space. Separate an essential requirement from a preference. Ask the landscape contractor which parts of the brief need more detail before a rgalmanza.com landscape design chicago proposal can be prepared.

Bring the questions you cannot answer yourself

Use photographs to show the areas you want discussed, including any concern about access or water collecting on the property. Ask what further assessment is needed rather than deciding on a particular solution in advance. If your ideas involve new paving or a change to planting, discuss how those choices relate to the surrounding space.

Discuss the whole project sequence

Ask which decisions belong in the initial proposal and which depend on later selections. If the work may happen in stages, request a description of what each stage includes and what will remain unfinished between visits. Confirm the arrangements you need to make before work begins, such as access and the protection of items you want to retain.

Plan the handoff

Before choosing a proposal, discuss the maintenance you are prepared to arrange after installation. Ask what instructions will accompany the work and which follow-up questions should go to the contractor. Review the proposal against your yard brief, checking that your main priorities have been addressed and that unresolved choices are identified.

Keep the next decision clear

Read the proposal for the work it actually describes. If an item is unclear, request an explanation rather than treating an omission as included work. Keep that answer with the current version.
